In Henry Fielding's Joseph Andrews, the importance of fashion recurs throughout the novel. The author examines this concept, and finds that "High People" are "People of Fashion," but that they are not "higher in their Dimensions" nor in "their Characters" (176) than the rest of society. He finds further that the concept of a person of fashion "was originally meant [...] [only as] a Person who drest himself in the Fashion of the Times; and the Word really and truly signifies no more to this ...
